

TO WHOM IT MAY CONCERN

As architect, townplanner and teacher in university, I have been involved in studies and plans about how cities are functioning, how they should be planned etc. One basic concern was to create a healthy environment in which human life could be made possible without the negative effects of modern industrial environments - but also have people live close to their places where they work. In short: to get away from the separation between work and home.

Bhagwan's vision which led to the establishing of communities all around the world, who live and work together, is for me the answer to this question which I was looking for during half of my life.

The City of Rajneeshpuram is the first example in the world that I know of where a society functions on the basis of togetherness and love instead of competition.

The energy that usually is wasted in the fights between people to establish their own individual rights and ways of living is used in Rajneeshpuram for positive development.

In my work as an architect I have witnessed many projects from the first plan to the last screw. I would say more than 50% of the energy which put out to make things possible is used in sorting out the different people's interests instead of the actual problem to be solved.

Bhagwan's teachings are the key to the solution to the problem modern urban societies have been creating.

The United States of America are lucky to have the space for a person like Him to make his resources available to mankind.
