To whom it may concern

From a professional standpoint as a physician, psychiatrist and assistant professor of child psychology I find Bhagwan's contribution to the field of human developmental psychology and behavior not only outstanding, but astounding. Also his understanding of group dynamics, social psychology and history of man's consciousness are without parallel. His teaching is a synthesis between modern western approaches, and ancient eastern techniques, put together in an unheard of manner. This multidirectional vision of man, oscillating between deepest misery and absolute glory, widens the scope of the relationship between doctor and patient and makes it more effective, more creative, more positive, more joyous. Not only I have found Bhagwan's teaching useful in my practice, but it has also changed my whole teaching technique. At the university there has been an improvement in the quality of the student's work.

Bhagwan's place in today's psychiatry is well ahead of Freud, Bion, Kernberg and Kohut. Furthermore he brings a totally new dimension to the sciences of human behavior.
